Lecithin Added Before or After Oil Infusion (and other rookie questions)?

Complete rookie, but have a bunch of nugs I am infusing into MCT oil/solid coconut oil. I have a billion questions, but just to get started, I am wondering when to add lecithin—while infusing these oils or down the road when I go to cook?

If it helps with shelf-life of the infused oil, I can see adding it before...but then thought perhaps the best practice is to leave the infused oils pure and only add the lecithin when combining my infused oils with, say, chocolates/etc.

I envision having mason jars on hand for months, if that factors into the decision. :)

I plan on rolling up my sleeves and making a bunch of small batch oils tomorrow, so wanted to ask...before or after (or does it not matter)?

normal. The brownies turned out well but the batter was literally like dough consistency, the cookies never flattened out and basically baked as balls of dough lol. I feel like lecithin is more for making homemade gummies or something and not needed in butter/oil but I will let others comment on what they think.

I honestly can't tell any difference between my gummies with or without lecithin so I stopped using it. Currently pretty high on one so I'd say they still work

When using lecithin you add it in during infusion process and whisk or stir in very VERY well.

Lecithin is an emulsifier, and it also helps absorption of thc. If you use lecithin and say u are using distillate to make gummies, the distillate will separate from the gummy mixture. You dont want that.

If u want to make baked goods I wld use infused butter w the lecithin. Butter always gives a more moist end product vs oil. I use butter in my brownies both infused and non infused. Total game changer. Use the same amount amount of butter the recipe calls for w oil. Just melt the butter first. If u dont want to add that much

I had these distillate edibles sitting for about a year. I'm wondering if they are still safe to eat? What is the chunky white stuff?
