WelderPrudent

Is NextCloud self-hosting still viable?

Lots of broken stuff... not a single docker compose reference I found that worked. Been spending a day just trying to make nextcloud + mariadb work. (Edit for additional context: The official now unofficial documentation from Nextcloud is not functional and has caused the troubleshooting "adventure": <https://github.com/nextcloud/docker/?tab=readme-ov-file#base-version---apache>)

If anybody can share a working docker-compose file (with image tags), you'll be saving a soul. Otherwise, I can't be spending any more time on nextcloud :(

SOLVED: This is what worked for me after trying different versions and docker images.

Nextcloud: lscr.io/linuxserver/nextcloud:28.0.4 (the latest = v29 has breaking changes with mariadb and causes internal server error during installation)

I've been using Nextcloud AIO for a while now, and it has never caused any problems—updating it is great too.

Exactly. Everyone tries to start with docker because its "easier," and then follows some random guide and then they can't figure out why everything is busted.

The official docs are excellent for bare metal or VM hosting. I've been hosting nextcloud for years and literally never had a problem I couldn't solve with the official docs, but it's like people are allergic to looking at documentation.

I stopped using Linuxserver Nextcloud. I had problems with the android app, with Colabora office and other small bugs.

I now use Nextcloud AOI and it's running rocksolid on a N100.

I let other people test it who use Google Drive for business. They claim it's even faster then that.

I've set up Apache+MariaDB+Nextcloud manually on my VPS back in 2017, because I didn't understand Docker. Still running and never gave me any trouble with updates.

AIO works great.

Sure. I use Debian and no docker. Not hard.
