Does anyone have any recommendations on what external CD/ DVD Drive I can get to rip my music to PC and turn that to flac for my upcoming DAP. I wanna rip whatever imma keep from the haul to my PC. I've seen people use Apple Super Drive for $25 or this beefy LG 4k Bluray Drive with case for $115.

I wouldn't mind being able to play my movie collection on PC but I kinda have a PS5 for that. So I'm wondering if the Apple Superdrive is good enough to rip accurate CDs on my PC or should I splurge more for the LG?

It is less time-consuming to download the files corresponding to the songs, but I had numerous LG drives during my DVD duplication days. I have never had a problem with them.

Coincidental timing--I have an LG AP70 Super Multi-Blade Drive that looks brand new and includes the original box, manual, software disc, and cable that I was planning to list on Facebook Marketplace today. I don't think it has ever been used. It was widely recommended in similar "best CD ripper" discussions from my research. As odd as it may sound, I forgot I had an old desktop PC in my attic with a disc drive...In any case, I was planning to let it go for $20, and I would cover shipping to domestic US addresses. I have photos that I'm happy to direct message you. For reference, this is the model I'm talking about-

I use a LG BP50NB40, it's a slim external and works great for ripping my music collection and the odd movie.

I bought this one for like 18 bucks a few months ago. Ripped tons of CDs and it's still doing fine.

I just got the LG drive setup to rip blu-rays. I'm really happy with it, but regarding the music CD ripping experience, I haven't noticed any difference between the newer LG drive, and the ancient basic HP external CD drive I was using before. Unless you want to rip movie files, I'd save the money and go with the Super Drive

The software you use to rip is also significant for the sound quality. I use dBPowerAmp for example. This program is great in correcting errors in CD's and can convert them to almost every file type possible.
