Migrating Qbittorrent to docker and bringing torrent data to it.

Hi everyone, I am about to launch a qBittorrent docker image here in my Homelab, however, I don't know how to migrate the data that qBittorrent has on all my downloads, so that it don't recheck all downloads when I create this container.

What I have now is a Full VM dedicated to it, which is overkill, even if I have 163 torrents on it.

A couple of remarks. qbittorrent support `--profile` and `--configuration=` as a way to tell it where to store its data.

You need to understand where they are pointing now and have those paths mounted within the container.

Afaik running directly on the OS,

```
--configuration==${HOME}/.config/qBittorrent
-- profile=${HOME}/.local/share/qBittorrent

You might want to play a bit with those in order to understand them.

Also I suggest linuxserver build:

Thanks for the response I will read this before the migration.

You can move the things the same way as you would moving to any other computer.

But I don't think you can get away with the recheck

The way I did it was to simply stop the existing qbittorrent program, deploy a fresh Docker install, and then see what folders it created in the persistent storage. Then you just drop the Docker version as well and replace those folders/data with the data from your previous install.

You need it to also have access to your torrent data though.

My MacBook will no longer recognize qBittorrent. It's never been friendly to the app, but there was usually a workaround. Not anymore.

When deploying a new image to my Raspberry Pi through Github Actions, is it recommended to publish it to Docker hub first, or build and and pull directly onto the server?
