Can we stop recommending the Winix 5500-2 and instead recommend the Winix D360?

Winix makes what seems to be a very comparable machine to the 5500-2, called the Winix D360.

But the D360 doesn't have an evil ionizer.

And, it's cheaper than the 5500-2!

Anyway, I haven't tried the D360, but based on the reviews I have no problem saying it seems like a better choice for those that want a Winix.

It's only available from Home Depot, but they have a good return policy.

Here it is at Home Depot: <https://www.homedepot.com/p/Winix-D360-True-HEPA-3-Stage-Air-Purifier-AHAM-Verified-for-360-sq-ft-1022-0222-02/315963585>

The D360 is nice since it doesn't include the pointless ionizer and I'm really considering getting one, but one potential issue I see is the price of replacement filters and the potential lack of them. Compared with the plasmawave models, the genuine filter for the D360 is more expensive for some reason. Filters from third party sellers are much more reasonable in price, but I only see a couple of them and all of them have very few reviews indicating relatively few sales. I'm concerned reasonably priced filters won't be easy to come by in the future unlike with the more popular plasmawave models that are uber popular and have tons of choices for filters.

I'm also unsure about all the weird quirks with winix purifiers like startup chimes, buttons that beep with each press, and a filter reset "button" that needs a paper clip to press. Seems like they can get annoying.

EDIT:

Apparently, just found out that some guy on reddit says you can straight up unplug the ionizer from the 5500 model.

Hm, if this also applies to all the other winix models, I may consider them since the filters are cheaper. If I'm cracking the device open, I might as well tape over the piezo electric beeper as well to quiet down those annoying signature winix chimes/beeps.

The 5500-2 doesn't emit any ozone with Plasmawave as demonstrated in the video below.

And, it's cheaper than the 5500-2!

The Winix site says it's $250, while I see the 5500-2 for $170 on Amazon. I don't see the D360 on Amazon for comparison.

Anyway I added it to the chart as a variant. Hopefully that's a good enough compromise.

D360 and D480 seem to be home depot exclusives
