How does unRAID store data?

I know it doesn't stripe the data like a RAID would (it's called unRAID after all) and if you loose more drives than you have parity drives you still have access to the files on the remaining drives. But how does it do that?

It stores the data like any other file system does, no striping.

which is updated anytime the array is written. The individual disks can be combined into shares, which is a top level directory on any disk, such that a share is presented as a volume that may span multiple disks.
