Psych podcasts

Are there any good psychology podcasts out there? Not interested in pop psych or pseudo psych (looking at you Mr. Peterson). Something that discusses actual scientific psych.

'Two psychologist four beers' is an amazing podcast. 0% pseudoscience, 100% funny academia. Now they are in a break. I specially recommend the old episodes, with Michael Inzlicht as co-host.

'Speaking of Psychology', the APA podcast, is general public oriented but with very high profile persons visiting.

'The mind society' is wonderful. It produces a few per semester, but is very well produced (both in content and audio quality).

There's also the Stanford Psychology Podcast. Nice interviews while not the best sound production (nothing horrible, but not at the professional level the other three have).

There is also 'New books in Psychology'; same situation: not amazing production, excelente content (if you like Psychology at American style. But, if you want to give an opportunity, they also have 'New books in psychoanalysis')

And as other people said: Very bad wizards and Psych are very good options. Also The Psychology Podcast, even when sometimes it fell in a few pseudoscientific rabbit holes (related to coaching, pop psych).

Quantitude is about psychometrics, and also easily the funniest podcast I've ever listened to. The hosts have a real knack for explaining complex stats concepts in a way that's easy to follow.

If you are interested in clinical psychology, I really like the Psychiatry and Psychotherapy Podcast by David Puder. He also has lots of guests from different orientations, for example the psychologists that developed the Mentalization Based Therapy

I would have loved the MBT episode! My research interest is personality disorders and that's a key modality for that population.

The Personality Psychology Podcast and Nullius in Verba (about doing good science generally, but by psychologists) are worth checking out if those areas are of interest.

I like the perception action podcast.

Depends on the type of psych. For general psych and testing, I like The Testing Psychologist. Since my concentration is neuro, I also enjoy Navigating Neuropsychology.
